Not illustrated. 1772 edition. Excerpt: ... The State of Physick in China. THE Chinese have several antient authors who treat of the art of medicine, and since the empire was established they have constantly applied themselves to it. > They are but little skilled in natural philofophy, alid are entirely ignorant of anatomy; they were never sensible of the uses of the parts of the human body, nor consequently the causes of distempers, all their knowledge depending upon a doubtsul system of the structure of the human frame; we ought not theresore to be surprised that they have not made the progress in this science that our European physicians have. This nation has always greatly esteemed the study of physick, not only because it is useful for the preservation of lise, and the recovery of health, but because they imagine there is a clofe connexion between the celestial motions and it. Formerly there were imperial academies for the improvement of medicine, but the physicians who are now most esteemed, are those who have got their knowledge from their foresathers in the fame line. Two natural principles of lise are laid down by the Chinese, viz. vital heat and radical moisture, of which the spirits and the blood are the vehicles. They cal the vital heat Yang, and the radical moisture Yn; and as these two names joined make what we call man, which has the name of Gin. in their language, it is likewise of the strokes or sigures of these two words, joined together, that they form the character or sigure of the name of man ; and they fay, in. a symbolical manner, that as the division and separation of these strokes divide the sigure or name of man, fo the division of these two principles alfo kills man. The Chinese think tha...
