I think we can arrange a little surprise for them. I have given the heads of both Creeds fair warning. If they choose to disregard it, so much the worse for them. There was a large gathering in Laluns house that night, but of men that I had never seen before, if I except the fat gentleman in black with the gold pince-ne. Wali Dad lay in the window-seat, more bitterly scornful of his Faith and its manifestations than I had ever known him. Laluns maid was very busy cutting up and mixing tobacco for the guests. We could hear the thunder of the drums as the processions accompanying each taia marched to the central gathering-place in the plain outside, the City, preparatory to their triumphant reentry and circuit within the walls. All the streets seemed ablaze with torches, and only Fort Amara was black and silent. When the noise of the drums ceased, no one in the white room spoke for a time. The first taia has moved off, said Wali Dad, looking to the plain. That is very early, said the man with the pince-ne. It is only half-past eight. The company rose and departed. Some of them were men from Ladakh, said Lalun, when the last had gone. They brought me brick-tea such as the Russians sell, and a teurn from Peshawur. Show me, now, how the English Memsahibs make tea. The brick-tea was abominable. When it was finished Wali Dad suggested going into the streets. I am nearly sure that there will be trouble to-night, he said. All the City thinks so, and Vox Populi is Vox Dei, as the Babus say. Now I tell you that at the corner of the
