Not illustrated. 1899 edition. Excerpt: ...heating of the rifle barrel nor great velocity of the bullet can destroy or remove any infective germs. By these experiments, in which not one only but several forms of infective microbe were used, it was shown, the author states, that for infection to occur in a gunshot wound the pathogenic germs must possess a high degree of virulency. With regard to the assumed failure of disinfectant treatment in cases of gunshot wound, it is pointed out that there is a marked distinction between this class of injury and incised wounds. In the former, the liability to infection is much greater on account of the more serious and more extensive wounding of the tissues. Rarlinski states, in a paper on infection of gunshot wounds by particles of intruder! clothing, that a wound caused by a carefullv disinfected bullet invariably becomes infected if such bullet has passed through dirty or artificially infected clothing. Such mischief, which cannot be prevented by cauterization or the injection of sublimate solution, is indicated by the formation of abscesses around the track of the bullet, and subsequently by general infection. The disseminated centiesof suppuration around the original wound are attributed to the forcible intrusion into the surrounding tissues of particles of clothing, which are carried far beyond the influence of any disinfecting agent applied to the actual seat of injury. The Use of Antistreptococc Serum in Gangrene of the Stump. The following case may, I think, be of interest partly on account of the frightful rapidity with which gangrene came on and partly because of the undoubted efficacy of the antistreptococcic serum in helping to arrest its spread in the stump after removal of the limb. The patient was a little girl, ten
