

Lindberghs Artificial Heart: More Fascinating True Stories from Einsteins Refrigerator

Several years ago, a New York high school teacher began using the Internet to post strange-but-true history and science factoids for his students to read. What began as an interesting Web site for students at Chatham High School soon became an internationally recognized page that garnered numerous awards, including Yahoos Site of the Week. In 2001, some of the stories were assembled into Einsteins Refrigerator, which has been translated into Korean and Chinese. Now comes silliness squared with Lindberghs Artificial Heart, author Steve Silvermans second collection of offbeat and often hilarious stories that offer a fascinating side of history thats not usually taught in school. Lindberghs artificial heart: Few people know it, but the famous aviator spent considerable time working on an artificial heart. Exploding whale: What did the Oregon Department of Transportation do with a dead whale that washed up on one of its beaches? Suffice it to say their decision to blow it up was quite the blubber blunder. Nose picking: Delve into the humorous findings of a study of this bad habit conducted by one of our institutions of higher learning. The fastest charcoal lighter ever: Using liquid oxygen at your family barbecue may speed up the cooking, but it does have its drawbacks . . . such as the fact that it vaporizes your grill. Carefully researched and frequently laugh-out-loud funny, the entertaining and educational stories within this books 192 pages-many never before shared on-line or otherwise-will delight students and teachers alike.
