YopENGLAND. A. c. 1:5$. prelates to pay the tythes granted to the king, on pain of excommunication, notwithstanding all oppositions, appeals, or exemptions. Such repeated ads of oppreffion, to extort money for a purpose to which it was never applied, could not fail to exhaust the patience of any people who retained the lead fence of injury or independence. The clergy groaned under these intolerable impositions :the people, driven to despair by poverty and distress, clamoured aloud against that eternal sponge, which sucked up the whole wealth of the nation and the nobility not only repented the insolence, avarice, and tyranny of the pope, but were exasperated at the weakness and partiality of the king, who had conferred upon foreigners the first offices of the kingdom, which they, and they only, had a right to enjoy. They had endeavoured to reform Henry's conduct by repeated remonstrances, and even restricted him by the most solemn oaths, which he broke without the least hesitation ;and now a spirit of discontent having diffused itself through all ranks and degrees of people, they resolved to procure redress for their grievances in a more effectual manner than they had hitherto attempted. They began to deliberate on this subject in private conferences, and determined to expel the foreign counsellors, as the first step towards an amendment of the administration. The barons Henry soon furnished the barons with an opportunity to execute their design ;for he convoked a parliament; and, according to custom, demanded a powerful supply to carry on the conquest of Sicily. He could not have touched them upon a more discordant string. They had been so harassed and exhausted by this ridiculous scheme, that they could not hear it mentioned without being filled with indignation.
