

A Relative Distance (Inspector John Crow Book 8)

Wolframite had been mined on Dartmoor in the past, though never profitably. Now, its increasing industrial importance had led to an old mine being reopened by an American-funded enterprise, with the backing of the local MP. He it was who was responsible for getting Scotland Yards Chief Inspector Crow dispatched to Devonshire when Norman, the firms over-conscientious Environment Co-ordinator, was found murdered on the site. Crow soon discovered that there was strong local opposition to the mine because it caused heavy traffic through a village where a girl had recently been knocked down. Ecology and anti-pollution interests were also opposed, and so was a local landowner who had unaccountably reneged on a profitable agreement to sell some land and was holding up development by every means in his power. The zealous Norman might have fallen foul of any of these elements. He might even have fallen foul of one of his colleagues, for all records of his activities in the two weeks before his death had vanished, and that seemed to indicate an inside job. Then all Crows theories were exploded by a demo which threatened the official opening of the plant, and the detective discovered that the relative distance between events seemingly unconnected could be very deceptive indeed.
