

Empathetic Treatment of Borderline Personality

Explore and understand new approaches in Borderline therapy Most persons with Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD) have endured massive empathetic failure at the hands of mental health providers. Empathetic Treatment of Borderline Personality: A Disorder of Trauma, Attachment, and Dissociation offers a new sympathetic, relational approach to treating this much maligned and misunderstood disorder. Presented along with a new reading of the origins and psychodynamics of the condition are treatment examples that can be readily applied to research and clinical practice. This text helps to clear a path through the enigmatic symptoms that often leave both patients and therapists bewildered and frustrated. In addition to being a critical reexamination of traditional theories, Empathetic Treatment of Borderline Personality: A Disorder of Trauma, Attachment, and Dissociation addresses BPD in light of recent research on relational trauma, child development, and dissociative processes. This provides a better understanding of the disorders evolution and an updated definition to work within. Through vivid case studies and understandable, research-based theory, an innovative vision of the therapist-patient bond is brought to light. This new approach to BPD therapy meets patients at the level of their own experience to provide them with a more secure base of attachment and supportive relationship. These unique, wide-ranging discussions and rational treatment techniques are readily useable and create the foundation for a more effective and empathetic alliance between those afflicted with BPD and their therapists.
