Excerpt: ... Nice tea! I thot I should have split; for Im blest if master had eaten a morsle of dinner! Never mind: down to tea they sat. Do you take cream and sugar, dear sir? says poar Kicksey, with a voice as tender as a tutteduff. Both, dearest Miss Kicksey! answers master; who stowed in a power of sashong and muffinx which would have done honour to a washawoman. I shant describe the conversation that took place betwigst master and this young lady. The reader, praps, knows y Deuceace took the trouble to talk to her for an hour, and to swallow all her tea. He wanted to find out from her all she knew about the famly money matters, and settle at once which of the two Grimnses he should marry. The poar thing, of cors, was no match for such a man as my master. In a quarter of an hour, he had, if I may use the igspression, turned her inside out. He knew everything that she knew; and that, poar creature, was very little. There was nine thousand a year, she had heard say, in money, in houses, in banks in In jar, and what not. Boath the ladies signed papers for selling or buying, and the money seemed equilly divided betwigst them. Nine thousand a year! Deuceace went away, his cheex tingling, his heart beating. He, without a penny, could nex morning, if he liked, be master of five thousand per hannum! Yes. But how? Which had the money, the mother or the daughter? All the tea-drinking had not taught him this piece of nollidge; and Deuceace thought it a pity that he could not marry both. The ladies came back at night, mightaly pleased with their reception at the ambasdors; and, stepping out of their carridge, bid coachmin drive on with a gentlemín who had handed them out--a stout old gentlemín, who shook hands most tenderly at parting, and promised to call often upon my ...
