How he would have conducted himself, if Ireton had continued to live, cannot now be told. But he immediately felt the difference, and Chap., i c J XVIII. was conscious to the removal of an awe under _j which he had experienced a certain uneasiness. lesi. The second day after the news of Iretons de-Conference cease, Cromwel called a meeting of several members of parliament and some chief officers of the army at the speakers house: and, a considerable respecting number being present, he suggested to them that, thesettie II,-?-i 11., mentofthe now that the late king was dead, and his son de-nation, feated, it seemed necessary to come to a settlement of the nation. Whitlocke suggested, that it was requisite in the first place to decide, whether the future government should be in the form of an absolute republic, or with some mixture of monarchy-And Croimvel immediately rejoined, that the lord commissioner had started the right point; to which he added that, if a mixed monarchy appeared to be the sense of the meeting, it would next be the question to consider in whose hands the monarchical power was to be placed. The lawyers were generally for a mixed monarchy, and many, particularly Widdrington, for conferring the crown on the duke of Gloucester, the third son of the late king: the soldiers for the Mrs. flutchinson says, Vol. II, p. 192, that Ireton had determined to come over to England, to endeavour to divert Cromwel from his destructive courses. I doubt whether Cromwel had so far unveiled his ambition during the life of the deputy. But this at
