The chivalarous horn, which was heard at the gate of Glenfruin when he so unwittingly offended the dainty ears of Leddy Glenjuckie, was the summons of the herald sent by the King to bring that chieftain to answer for the charge preferred against him for the death of Father Mungo, and for holding the Duchess of Albany prisoner. On seeing the approach of the herald and his retinue towards the castle, the warders, according to custom on the appearance of strangers, had shut the gate; and Glenfruin, when he left the leddy with his daughters, went to the top of the embattled wall over the entrance to parley with the summoner. Keith, the herald, in due form, having declared his office, demanded admission--a request which the chieftain did not very well know how to refuse, but which, somehow, he knew not wherefore, he was not much inclined to grant. He was not conscious of having done any thing to bring upon him the royal displeasure; but what he had heard from the Earl of Athol with respect to the Duchess, and the little encouragement that he had received for seizing Sir Robert Graeme, made him uneasy and apprehensive, and these feelings led him to say, without affecting to have heard the demand of admission, Aye, and so yell pe te Kings herald--its a praw ting to pe te Kings herald, tat we al must alloo--oomph! and washer Majestie in te goot hell, and te Queen hersel too?--for te Glenfruins wish tem paith, al every mothers son of em very well, and in te goot hell--oomph. But, replied the herald, this is no place for such discourse; I must execute my commission,
