

Works, Vol. 3 (Classic Reprint)

In 1774 Burke had been elected for Bristol, and at the dissolution of parliament in 1780 he arrived in that city with a view to offering himself for re-election. During the six years that he had represented Bristol he frequently found himself unable to share the opinions of his constituents, while the independent spirit he had shown on questions of Irish trade, the Insolvent Debtors Bill, and the relief of Roman Catholics, had alienated much of the support he had hitherto received. He now returns, as he says, to make up his account, and, in a speech surpassed by none in gravity, elevation, and moral dignity, delivered at the Guildhall, he explains the motives by which he was actuated, preferring to lose his seat rather than renounce the objects for which he had labored. It was not possible always to conform to their wishes, but he had ever maintained their interests for, as he says, I am to look to your opinions, but to such opinions as you and I must have five years hence, It is fitting to examine the members conduct, but it must be with discretion, not like cavi Uing pettifoggers prying into flaws and hunting for exceptions. Members must be allowed to act in a very enlarged view of things: if not, the national representation will infallibly be degraded into a confused and scuffling bustle of local agency. If the people choose their servants on the principle of mere obsequiousness and flexibility, and total vacancy or indifference of opinion on a public matters, the State will cease to be sound, and it will be in vain to think of saving it. Burke ever stood by the principles of justice, benevolence, and a love of true liberty. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and do not occur in the book.)
